FINANCIAL BEGINNINGS

JULY '11

WHEN I GROW UP, I WANT TO BE...

You've been asked the question over and over again, "What do you want to be when you grow up?" Do you ever come up with an answer? Do you change your mind a lot or just make something up? Selecting your future career path is a big decision, but that doesn't mean it needs to be an intimidating one.

Here are a few questions and steps that may help you figure out what you would like to do for the rest of your life:

- What do you love to do? Create a list of the 10 things that you love to do the most. What do you like about each of those things?
- What are your strengths? What do you think you're good at, and what have other people noticed you're good at? Write a list of the top 10.
- What type of person would you want to spend time with? Describe in detail the kind of person you would want to work with, include gender, age and personality traits.

It may be difficult to come up with all the answers right away, so take some time to think about each question. Throughout the next week, make a note whenever you notice you're good at something or find yourself doing something enjoyable, fun or intriguing. Then, add those items to your lists.

Once you've compiled all three of your lists, pull them together and start thinking about ways you can combine them into a business or career where you will be doing something you love, doing something you're good at, and working with people you enjoy. You never know, your future may be a list away!
